Mesenchymal stem cell transplantation for movement disorders. Mesenchymal stem cells (MSCs) are readily obtainable from bone marrow and have the potential to differentiate into most mesodermal cell types. Recent studies have demonstrated that MSCs can be transplanted into experimental animals, where they migrate to the site of injection and are capable of differentiation into glial and neural lineages. Moreover, MSCs are not associated with any major ethical issues such as tumorigenesis or immune rejection, and, as MSCs and their derivatives can be safely administered into patients without the need for immunosuppression, they have the potential to treat a variety of neurological disorders. Several clinical trials of cell-based transplantation therapies for central nervous system disorders have recently been initiated, including treatment for Parkinson disease and multiple sclerosis. The results from these early phase clinical trials demonstrate the safety of administering MSCs to patients and suggest that MSCs may have beneficial effects in the treatment of movement disorders such as Parkinson disease, multiple sclerosis, Huntington disease, and

In addition, the finding that levels of inhibin-B decreased in the DG during hypoxia is in line with previous studies \[@pone.015051.ref029],[@pone.015051.ref033],[@pone.015051.ref037]\]. Taken together, our findings indicate that DG neurons are more vulnerable to low oxygen tensions. Regarding the underlying mechanisms, our data point to a lack of energy availability in the hippocampus as a consequence of the hypoxia/ischemia insult, which, in turn
